INTRODUCTION

The Tokyo employment market has shown strong growth throughout the second half of 2013 which we expect to carry through to 2014.

This has been driven by an economic recovery in Japan, improvements in the global economy and to the results of some of the structural reforms we have seen as part of “Abenomics”.

The government’s willingness to weaken the yen to increase the competitiveness of Japanese manufacturing exports has had the side benefit of making Japan a better location for foreign companies to invest in and with inflation slowly beginning to rise we can expect investments to continue flowing into the country.

This market improvement has driven significant demand in two of the key areas which Ambition Japan covers: Finance & Accounting and IT roles. In the recession that followed the “Lehman Shock”, hiring within these two areas was a lower priority. Looking to simply maintain status quo, businesses focussed more on sales activities to enhance profitability. But with business sentiment much more positive, companies are now more willing to invest in these areas and are looking to roll out new systems and restart projects which have been on hold during the recession.

These improvements in the employment market will continue to make Japan a highly competitive market for sought after talent – bi-lingual individuals with professional qualifications and experience either overseas or dealing with offshore management/headquarters.

As such we would expect to see salary inflation return to the Japanese employment market in 2014, with job seekers being able to expect salary increases of around 10% when changing jobs.

Firms looking to expand their headcount in Tokyo will face significant challenges. Successful firms will be the ones who, not only focus on potential financial rewards, but those who can also clearly demonstrate a track record of growth, a vision and business plan for the Japanese market and a commitment to the wellbeing of their employees.
